THE TELEMETER- FORERUNNER OF THE PUSH-BUTTON AGE

You've heard a lot about the push-button age; when the fulfillment of your slightest wish will be no farther away than the nearest plastic button. With the development of a 6x6x8 inch gimmick called a Telemeter, a life that has seemed to be merely a figment of a desperate science-fiction writer's mind, is now almost a reality. For example, it won't be long before you'll be sitting in front of your TV set, watching your favorite program, and the announcer will come on offering a brand new plastic oxygen-filled space helmet, or a Phil Rizzuto shortstops' glove -- and you won't have to budge an inch to get it. You'll just drop the necessary coins in a slot in the top of the set, and your helmet or glove will arrive in the morning mail! If that sounds fantastic, it won't after you learn what the Telemeter can do already.

We'll give you an idea of some of the jobs that are planned for this little Plastic gadget. It will be able to deliver your morning paper to your house every day -- but it won't be exactly the same paper you get now. The night before, you'll just push the buttons marked sports, movies, radio, news, comics, or what-have-you, and your paper will contain only those items! And that paper will be right up to the minute! The sheet that arrives at eight o'clock will be filled with news that happened less than an hour before!

But, wait -- let's explain what's being done right now, so you can see what can be done. In the desert resort of Palm Springs, California, the Telemeter is undergoing its first big test -- that of tackling the problem of pay-as-you-go television. This has been made necessary because of the increasing cost of big network TV. To give you an example: the cost of the time alone for an hour on a major network was $25,000 in 1950, and doubled to about $50,000 in 1952! As more stations are licensed, the figures will continue to increase. But, by 1955 (when they expect 50,000,000 sets to be in operation) it will be possible to put on the best shows for as little as five cents per set! In Palm Springs, these little Telemeters are being installed on TV sets, so that the viewer can pay for the programs that he wants to see. If this test is successful, it will be tried on a nation-wide scale, and the push-button age will begin!

(Instead of getting commercials during programs, the entertainment will be pure, with no interruptions for advertising. All free programs won't be eliminated, as this plan will be used only to send you those shows that aren't possible now because of excessive costs.

Another industry that will be revolutionized by the Telemeter is the movies, and the Palm Springs experiment is making tests concerning the showing of first-run films over the local TV screens. Right now, a movie on TV can expect to make only about $75,000, while the big selling films shown in movie theatres stand to gross between five and seven million dollars! However if the film were to be shown simultaneously in fifteen or twenty Telemetered TV set areas at a cost of about twenty five cents per set, there would be a profit of four million dollars on the first showing alone! It's no wonder that big movie moguls are studying this method of putting the best movies on TV, instead of showing films made when your father was a newspaper delivery boy!

Basically, the Telemeter is a sort of juke box with a brain, though its activities will far outstrip the gaudy machine that plays your favorite tunes in the corner hamburger palace. Before the coins are inserted, the screen will show a badly scrambled version of the picture. All you will have to do is choose your program, discover the cost (which will appear on the screen over the scrambled picture) and drop in your coins. And if you don't have the right change, this obliging little gizmo will credit your over-payment toward the next show you want to see.

The brains behind the Telemeter are also considering using it as a handy method of determining just what the public wants. If you are watching a program and you don't like it, all you'd have to do is push the right button, and your response would be flashed, via an electronic tube, to the studio. On the other hand, pushing another button, would register your approval, and your request for more shows just like it. Thus, instead of basing their opinion of audience reaction on a few scattered phone calls and letters, the producers would know exactly what percentage of the audience liked the show, and how many would have thrown fruit and vegetables at the participants, if they had been within range. These push buttons could also be used, at election time -- both for public opinion polls, and for registering the actual vote. The woman of the house could use it for ordering the latest bonnet from the Bon Ton Shoppe, and Dad could press a button and send for that special fishing tackle he's always wanted. And, if nobody's looking, burtons will be pushed that will bring in such a flood of cosmic ray guns, baseball gloves, cowboy boots, and gosh-knows-what-all, that the mailman will be bow-legged from carrying it.

Just imagine a morning in a fully-Telemetered house. At eight o'clock the alarm goes off, and then the radio goes on--filling the house with music. At the same time, the fire goes on under the coffee, the toaster starts heating up, and the juice starts squirting out of an automatic squeezer. When you get downstairs, the newspaper is clicking out of your TV set, edited just the way you asked for it. In fact, with the rapid advances being made in the world of electronics and the electronic brain, it won't be many years before it will be possible to stay in your house for days at a time getting all your tedious chores done automatically. But until the electronic magicians start manufacturing artificial sunshine, grassy lawns, and sandy beaches--better not throw away your shoes and your bicycle!
